The Metalogicon Of John Of

Written in 1159 and addressed to Thomas Becket, John of Salisbury's The Metalogicon presents—and defends—a thorough study of the liberal arts of grammar, logic, and rhetoric. The very name "Metalogicon," a coinage by the author, brings together the Greek meta (on behalf of) and logicon (logic or logical studies). Thus, in naming his text, he also explained it.

McGarry's translation of John of Salisbury's The Metalogicon is probably the most underrated, aggregated authority on pedagogy. It is a true travesty that the Confician hoards have won this millennia and churned out drones with no reasoning skills of their own. Thank goodness there has been a neo-classical revival of the Trivium in the US.

The Metalogicon | Paul Dry Books, Inc.

Abstract: John of Salisbury has long been celebrated as one of the foremost humanists of the twelfth-century renaissance, an erudite correspondent, legal expert, historian, poet, diplomat and political thinker, and clerk to two successive archbishops of Canterbury, Theobald and Thomas Becket. His Metalogicon, ostensibly a defence of the role of logic and of Aristotle's Organon in the educational syllabus of the day, makes a powerful argument for an educational system of real practical ...

The idea of contemporaries standing on the shoulders of giants of Antiquity first appears in written form in the Metalogicon. After the death of Theobald in 1161, John continued as secretary to his successor, Thomas Becket, and took an active part in the long disputes between that primate and his sovereign, Henry II, who looked upon John as a papal agent.

John of Salisbury - Wikipedia

John composed several treatises of philosophical interest, most notably the Policraticus (PC), but also the Metalogicon (ML) and the Entheticus de dogmate philosophorum (EMM). These works were all completed between 1154 and 1159, during the period of John's service to Archbishop Theobald, Becket's predecessor at the see of Canterbury.

John of Salisbury (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

The crisis passed, but to some extent it influenced John's two books, the Policraticus and the Metalogicon (both 1159), in which his general intention was to show his contemporaries that in their thought and actions they were defecting from the true task of humanity. His work represented a protest against the professional specialization slowly developing in royal and papal administration and in the universities.

John begins with the profound announcement that Jesus is the "in the beginning" creative Word of God who had become embodied (incarnated) as a human being to be the light of life for the world. After this comes the proclamation that this Jesus is the Son of God sent from the Father to finish the Father's work in the world (see 4:34 and note).
