The Mormon People: the making of an American faith (Random House, 2012), is general history of the Mormon movement that explores its uneasy relationship with American culture. It traces Mormonism's initial rejection of American cultural and economic norms, the religion's gradual assimilation into them in the twentieth century, and its precarious position today, when it is gaining strength in the global South but again finding itself culturally out of step with the American mainstream.

New in the mix of this scholarship is Max Mueller's Race and the Making of the Mormon People, which is a provocative account of the construction of race in Mormon history. Mueller's study, produced initially as his PhD dissertation at Harvard, demonstrates how "whiteness" was built into the foundation of Mormonism.
