Howard Gardner, multiple intelligences and education ...

The Unschooled Mind In Part 2, Gardner explores how understanding develops: Long before children encounter the scholarly disciplines, they learn about the world through actions in the world, often with little or no help from adults.

About this Guide

The core problem is that scholastic and disciplinary forms of knowing are often at odds with "the unschooled mind" within nearly every student. Surveying a wide range of research on early learning and cognition (much of it his own), Gardner maintains that most children tend to develop deeply entrenched patterns of thinking and learning by the time they are five years old.
